Finding Your Inspiration

Creating an inspiration board is the first thing you should do after you become engaged. Your board will help you discover the look and mood you want to set for your big day, but it will also help you communicate it to wedding vendors and make important commitments and arrangements.

Finding your true wedding style is one thing but communicating it to your vendors is another! That is why I love the process of putting together an inspiration board. Your board could be made from a piece of poster board from a craft store, a box that holds swatches, ideas and fabrics, or it could be a digital image or PowerPoint presentation. I don't think it matters what form it is in. It only matters that you piece together the ideas and items that inspire you so that you can visualize your wedding mood, theme and look.

Lucky Tradition

Something Old: The altar cloth used in Kari and Troy's wedding was purchased at a flea market in Paris and used in my wedding to Justin five years ago.

Something New: Kari received a gift of diamond earrings from our parents.

Something Borrowed: Kari borrowed our mother's necklace to enhance her strapless dress.

Something Blue: The insides of Kari's shoes were blue!
